Bengal Ophthalmic Journal goes Online

I would like to begin by thanking our members for the interest and enthusiasm you have shown in The Bengal Ophthalmic Journal. We have received a number of letters with encouragement, positive suggestions and constructive criticism all of which are appreciated.

The quality of the submissions continues to improve and the process of peer review of articles has continued this year.

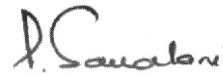

The photo quiz which was started last year has generated a lot of interest and we received quite a few interesting submissions. Unfortunately not all of them could be included due to space constraints.

In the journal scan section I have tried to include work which will be of clinical significance. A lot of interest is being generated regarding intravitreal injection of drugs for ARMD and I have tried to display a sample of the work being done. The work done regarding the drug olopatadine is relatively old (published between 2003 and 2005) but the abstracts have been included in the journal scan section as the drug has only recently been introduced in India and I thought it would be of interest to the practitioner.

One of the major achievements this year is that, beginning with this issue, The Bengal Ophthalmic Journal will be available online. The website is still at a fledgling stage and we would like your suggestions on how we can make it better. Please check out the site: www.oswb.org/journal and send us your feedback.

After this issue, I will be handing over the reins of the journal to our next editor. I am counting on your support to make each future issue better than its predecessor – so that soon we, as a society can boast of a journal we are proud of.
